

Web Design For Adults

When you land on some websites, are your eyes squinting as you rush to click the back button? Blaring sound, triple espresso flash animation, black background with small grey print.

There's a lot of advanced technology available for web design.
And cars are capable of driving 150+ miles an hour.
Just because you can, doesn't mean you should.

Hello, I am <name>. I do web design.
I'm not 20-something, neither is my web design.

Your website is a marketing tool, it reflects you.
Shouldn't it be professional...
absent of brashness...
present of distinction and style.

Web design that is:

- Clean. emphasizes your message rather than distracting from it.
- Elegant. visually attractive, widening the eyes and pulling your visitor in.
Leading and guiding your reader through the information.
- Efficient. simple, well-defined, recognizable navigation rather than a game of hide and seek.

The power of simplicity. Unique designs – not cookie-cutter template designs – that reflect your personality and goals.

Clean. Efficient. Elegant. On time. Within budget.
Web design that works for you.
It's that simple.

About

Not All Geek

Hi, I'm <name>.

I've been in the tech sector for over 10 years working with web design and development and Oracle database client/server software. I've worked for large companies, I've worked for start-ups, I've worked as a sole proprietor.

I've matched wits with million+ record databases and local DSL providers... well maybe that one did not go so well.

My bias has largely been information... storing it, accessing it and presenting it efficiently, succinctly and transparently to the user.

I have an eye for graphics, but I am not a graphic designer and not a good choice for "corporate identity" projects.

I am well versed in databases, web scripting, content management and dynamic content. Additionally, I've had five years of documentation experience, technical and otherwise and can help you with documentation and writing.

While I do spend the bulk of my working hours with technology and computers, you won't find me speaking in "another language" when I talk to you.

Not all my friends judge the quality of their life by how fast their internet connection is. I'm literate, well read, socially aware, musically inclined and can carry on an adult conversation.

Technology has a role in our lives and our business... contact me to help you with web design and database oriented roles in your life and business.
